

Canmore dinner theatre puts together rousing revue

LOUIS B. HOBSON
Calgary Sun

The Cornerstone Dinner Theatre in Canmore has put together one of the best musical revues I've seen in a long while Putting it Together is a mini musical showcasing the songs of Stephen Sondheim, whose works include A Little Night Music, Sweeney Todd, Into the Woods, Follies, A Funny Thing Happened on the Way to the Forum and Do I Hear a Waltz.

It was created in 1992 in England and opened off Broadway the following year, but it was the revival in 1998 which starred Carol Burnett and Bronson Pinchot that finally garnered it the attention it deserves.

The revival rearranged the 30 songs so they tell a story about a crumbling relationship of an older couple played against a younger couple's budding relationship.

It's a storyline that most definitely is not missed in Cornerstone's production under the direction of JP Thibodeau, who also appears as the younger man.

Thibodeau has entrusted the roles of the older couple to Karen J. Minish and Joe Morris, who bring incredible depth and emotion not just to their vocals but to their reactions.

When Minish sings Like It Was from Merrily We Roll Along, it is not just the pain in her voice that is heart wrenching, but the pain in Morris' face. It's this attention to detail that gives the production as much heart as it does humour and soul.

Much of the humour comes courtesy of narrator Parris Greaves. He's a bit of a scamp, milking laughs playing a houseboy to Minish's Everybody Ought to Have a Maid, but when he takes centre stage with Buddy's Blues, he's a song-and-dance-man version of the Energizer Bunny.

Thibodeau and Louisa O'Keane have their moments selling Sondheim's melodies, harmonies and sentiments with skill, pizzazz and ease. Everything about Putting It Together is outstanding, from Deborah Rosen's dynamite four-piece band and Amber Bissonette's catchy choreography to Bill Brown's functional set and frenetic lighting.

The only drawback is Putting It Together must end Feb. 6.

PHOTO SUBMITTED

Joe Morris and Karen J. Minish light up the stage in Putting it Together.

CITYTV, THE CALGARY SUN & CJAY 92 PRESENT:

JEBB FINK

UNCENSORED!

FRIDAY JANUARY 29

WITH GUESTS
FLAMESCENTRAL
WORLD CLASS SPORTS & ENTERTAINMENT VENUE

TICKETS AVAILABLE AT UNIONEVENTS.COM,
TICKETMASTER.CA, ALL TICKETMASTER LOCATIONS
OR CHARGE BY PHONE 403-777-0000

FOR YOUR CHANCE TO WIN TICKETS, GO TO WWW.CALGARYSUN.COM/CONTESTS. DEADLINE FOR ENTRY IS NOON ON JANUARY 22ND. WINNERS WILL BE CONTACTED BY PHONE.

Putting it Together

Cornerstone Dinner Theatre (Canmore)

STARRING

Karen Minish and Joe Morris

EARLY SHOW AT 7PM | LATE SHOW AT 10PM

After a day of skiing, Canmore's Cornerstone Theatre provides the meal, the company and some decent theatre.

Not cutting any corners

Cornerstone Theatre has professionalism and hot tea

C.B. MACKINTOSH
LACHLAN MACKINTOSH

When one says Canmore, lots of things come to mind — the Nordic Centre, Crazy Weed, Ha Ling Peak, the Olympics, and so on. But when one says Canmore, dinner theatre doesn't necessarily come to mind. Somewhat under the radar for the past decade, Cornerstone Theatre has made the Oh Canada Eh? dinner show a popular stop for summer tourist traffic, and lots of Bow Valley locals. In September 2009, Cornerstone broadened its scope to bring popular and proven live theatre to the Bow Valley by adding a Broadway winter season, and voilà...

Putting It Together (1993) is one of several Stephen Sondheim revues. In Los Angeles, the cast included Carol Burnett. In New York, this was the show that brought Julie Andrews back to Broadway after a 30-year absence. It features more than two-dozen tunes from the Sondheim songbook covering material from more than 10 musicals. Plucked from the original context, the songs coalesce into a timeless meditation on love and marriage as told by two couples: one lovestruck, about to be married, and the other, an older shadow couple, the people we might become; in other words, our parents.

To a younger crowd, Cornerstone Theatre might feel appealingly retro, a throwback to a time before the internet and TV, when people would gather in a room and break bread, make music, tell stories. Its log cabin-style design feels both comfy and rustic, its seating arrangement reminiscent of community hall weddings. There is a fireplace in the foyer when you come in from the cold, and an unmistakable small-town friendliness to the staff who greet and seat us.

As the meal begins, starting at 6:30 p.m., visitors and locals rub elbows at long tables, helping themselves to communal bowls of salad and rolls while drinks are served. There's a leisurely pace to the meal. The down-home menu is tasty and eclectic, and the tea is good and hot — an important detail. By the time the entertainment begins, at 8 p.m., those at our table have bonded. We sit back, ready to relax among friends.

Although Sondheim is considered "high art" in the musical theatre world, his commitment to thoughtful comedy blends well with Cornerstone's unapologetic penchant for slapstick and cheese. Pariss Greaves kicks the show off with humour and panache with some audience "instructions" before transitioning to his role as the featured couples' punchy commentator.

Sondheim's song titles almost tell the story: "Hello Little Girl," "Everybody Ought to Have a Maid" (appar-

THEATRE REVIEW

PUTTING IT TOGETHER

Runs until February 6
Cornerstone Theatre (Canmore)

ently not just a Neil Young thing), "Rich and Happy," "Have I Got a Girl For You," "Good Thing Going," "Country House," "There's Always a Woman," "Marry Me A Little," "The Road You Didn't Take," and "Could I Leave You?"

Although some titles sound a bit dated, Sondheim strikes to the contradictory heart of the matter, and Cornerstone's accomplished cast of local and returning actors and singers mine a poignant mix of wisdom and idealism, humour and hypocrisy, tenderness and sarcasm. While contemporary treatments of domestic tensions tend to be violent, wrought with anxiety and fatalism, Sondheim's show tunes embrace and celebrate these common marital yearnings and strivings: a couple's need for domestic help, a severe case of premarital panic, a man's love of pretty women and a woman's desire to be lovely.

Sondheim is clearly great material for the music theatre artist as well. The women have many of the best lines in the show. Both Louisa O'Keane and Karen Minish have big, beautiful voices, and delivered their Sondheim non sequitours and syncopated rhymes with style and joie de vivre. The guys had to work hard to keep up with them. Greaves was fun as the odd man out, J.P. Thibodeau dashing as the younger man, and Joe Morris brought some real pathos to his performance as the older husband.

Over by 10 p.m. the two-act play kept us talking on the short drive home.

Comment on this story
at ffwdweekly.com